

RHODE ISLAND

Rhode Islanders will head to the polls to select their choice for governor, attorney general, and treasurer. Additionally, all 38 senate seats and all 75 house seats are up for election. Democrats are expected to maintain control of the executive office and legislative chambers. Former CVS executive Helena Foulkes defeated incumbent Governor Daniel McKee in the Democratic primary, effectively guaranteeing her position as the new governor.

Attorney General

Republican Nominee

Alan Gordon

Alan Gordon earned his law degree from the University of Buckingham in England and subsequently passed all twelve England and Wales Bar examinations.

Gordon labels himself as a staunch conservative advocate. Gordon wants the attorney general's office to examine how abortion laws interact with homicide statutes, children protection laws, mandatory reporting requirements, medical licensing laws, and other criminal provisions. Additionally, he supports eliminating the assault weapons ban, claiming that the law deters responsible citizens from these weapons rather than criminals.

Gordon vows to aggressively investigate human trafficking, child exploitation, and corruption. He will work closely with law enforcement, victim advocates, and community organizations to identify victims and dismantle trafficking networks.

Gordon pledges to protect the state's natural resources and encourage responsible economic growth. He calls to increase protections over the public shoreline and expand accountability for polluters.

On public safety, Gordon would ban bail eligibility for dangerous offenders and increase requirements to secure a plea bargain.

Trivia: Alan Gordon holds a self-designed Bachelor of Arts degree from The Pennsylvania State University, with a concentration focused on the legal and public policy issues surrounding cannabis reform.
